PAUL MEETS

TUG OF WAR

Paul McCartney talks to Andy Mackay

Andy I listened to the album yesterday. I listened to it straight through three times, which is more like colliding with it than listening to it, but it sounds incredible and I think it has the sound of a classic to me. The reactions must be pretty good for the privileged few.

Paul I must say, yeah, the reaction is good.

Andy But one thing that struck me about it is obviously that there is a concept or a theme or a thread running through it that holds it together, and I wonder how much that was anything that consciously affected the way you were working. I know you have the general concept of a tug of war, and ebony and ivory — the idea of opposites and so on. Did that affect the material in between?

Paul I think it affected more how we approached the recording. The actual writing of the songs mostly was done before we started recording, and the songs that were written afterwards weren't particularly written with the concept in mind, but as Dave Mattacks says, it is more of a "bondcept" album. We knew that we were kinda going for a certain sound, and we were using a very broad theme, a kinda tug of war thing, so that made us think of pictures and stuff, of everything that we were recording, and sounds we were putting down for the effect they'd have, so that we could always look to the concept to see which way we were going. The writing, actually, was done more on just individual little things, you know, like that such-and-such a song would be done because of such-and-such a mood, not necessarily relevant to the so-called concept thing.

Andy I know you were working on material for two albums, I mean that you are still working on a second album. Was the material for 'Tug of War' simply that which was ready, sort of fell into place, or did you try and consciously finish off that set of songs?

Paul There's a little bit of both there. It had a bunch of stuff that was ready, as you nearly always do for an album. You've got a few songs you've been working on, you're waiting to record, and in the middle of them was this song called "Tug of War", and as that had started by me liking the title and the idea, and seeing that it applied to more than just a sport, I did the song and started just to kind of plonk that in amongst these others that were, you know, ready to go anyway. Any lyrics I had to finish up a little bit would be governed by the new idea of a theme, so I didn't really want to get too hung up on a theme, 'cos it's like everything regimented, and nothing flowing, and I wouldn't have wanted that really, 'cos I like the idea of a little bit of regimentation but a lot of stuff that was just kind of free-flying amongst it all. That's why I kind of say this is a sort of loose concept, sort of starts with a concept, flows into some stuff that you could vaguely say was in the concept, but it starts sort of free-flowing all over the place. But eventually, by the time it gets to the end of the album, it sort of returns to the concept. So you know it's just like a very loose one.

Andy Obviously one is reminded of 'Sergeant Pepper' in that that was the first really big concept album. Was that put together as a concept?

Paul No, that was the thing about that, it really wasn't. The thing that made that a concept thing was the period, the fashions of the period, you know. What was going on was very much one kind of thing, like the psychedelic bit, which made it seem like a concept. Everything that we were doing, all the songs we were doing, the general direction of them, was crazy as opposed to straight. I mean the bad words — both of them to sum them up — you know what I mean, and it was really just a collection of songs but, because of the fashions of the period, you'd be taking songs off a wall-poster rather than out of, let's say, kind of a love experience or a tiff experience, as you might have done a few years before.

Andy Right. There is also a very strong English quality about 'Sergeant Pepper', English-y references to fairgrounds, and the sounds made on this album, although you have used various American superstar musicians and other people, the overall quality is very English to me, which I like very much. It's something I associate very much with your writing and the way you work on records. That's nothing particularly conscious, I imagine, it's just the way. . .

Paul No, I think that's just me and George marking aim together, both of us are very English; we live here, and you know, you wouldn't exactly sort of say George is sort of a hip American style producer at all. You know he is not that way. . .

Andy Not exactly.

Paul . . . and my stuff doesn't lean in that direction really, so I suppose it's just that the combination of both of us makes it . . .

Andy In a way it's continuing the theme of contrast, because that works incredibly well on this record, the way you do get the really strong feel on "What's That You're Doing?"

Paul Yes.

Andy And then that sort of goes against the English-y tracks. The texture of the album is very interesting and it moves from very thick, rich, George Martin-y type arrangements and sounds, and very fascinating sounds which you can't really identify as any particular thing, through to acoustic guitar and voice, and I very much like the way it switches between them. Also I like the way the opening track does exactly that: it starts off with what seems to me, a kind of solo statement, and it's more or less your voice, and that's all you notice, and then before long, without really noticing it, you've got a lot of other textures and things coming in.

Paul Yeah, that's what I was saying before is what happens. The themes, rather than influencing the actual songs themselves, and the words which would have been a kind of regimented way to go, were all left to just sort of free-flow, but the ideas like you say, going from a funky track to a sort of very string-quartet-y track, that does sort of keep up the contrasts idea. That was why I liked the idea of tug of war, if we were going to bother with any kind of theme, because it's a theme that you can find in everything.

Andy So in this respect you obviously benefited from the absolute freedom that you had, of working on your own with whoever you wanted to work with, so that there's no need for it to ever sound like the group playing or like anything except the sounds that you want, which I think works very well for me. But just as a sort of side question, the second album of the material that you are still working on, will that tie up with 'Tug of War'?

Paul I think it will sort of tie up with 'Tug of War' really, because one of the tracks that we didn't put on the first album ties up with 'Tug of War', so probably that will be on the second one. There will be a kind of link through. I really don't know how that second one is going to turn out yet, but we are going to make it in the same way as we made the first one, which was to make everything up, and see what it all is. If stuff needs to be moved about, you know, then we'll do that.

Andy Is that a long way from completion?

Paul I don't know really. We were thinking of it being done within about a month or so, but you know how these things go, it may not be done, in which case it will be a long wait. But we are just finishing up the tracks. It's gone quite right.

Andy And that's using the same kind of textures?

Paul Some of them are the same kind of textures, but somebody asked me that actually, "Is the second one going to be like the first one?" At first when I thought about it I was going to say, "Yes, you know, it's going to be like more of the same", but actually the way it's working out, it's slightly different, because it's as if we have got the first album behind us and now we are sort of trying to do something that we didn't do on the first album, just out of natural wishing to slightly change, wishing not to continue the same thing.

Andy So it may be a bit different?

Paul Yes, I think there will be a whole lot of different set of textures, that's what it's turning out anyway.

Andy The most interesting, the one I like best actually, is "Wanderlust" which is my favourite track.

Paul Great.

Andy I love the way that works just with the drums and voice basically, and brass. I think it's very strong.

Paul That's Philip Jones' lads.

Andy Is it? I was going to ask about that; it sounds brilliant.

Paul I was thinking about it and George knew Philip Jones, and he brought in cassettes and this kind of thing . . . I had the idea for the sound, you know, sort of like Christmas-y brass, sort of Pickwick Dickensian sort of feel to it all, you know, like English really. Well that sounds to me like old Phil, so I got onto the blower, you know. . .

Andy And that showed the contrast between that and "Get It" is very strong.

Paul Silly, yes, isn't it? That was one of the ones when we had a rough running order and we plonked those next to each other — just sort of thinking maybe they'll go — and it was one of those you couldn't alter.

Andy It's something you quite like doing, I think, isn't it? In a way it's deflating a mood slightly because "Wanderlust" is a very intense song. I am not certain what it's about, and I was going to ask you about that, but I mean, it's an intense mood.

Paul It's nice in what it does, though. It just breaks out of it like some little bubble bursts, then off you go.

Andy It's very much like life, you know, that things are not so great . . .

Paul And suddenly the pictures switches to something completely different. It was a mistake really, not a mistake, a fluke, because we just plonked them in that order on a hunch, thinking that that might work, let's try it and see if it does, and it seemed to work.

Andy Is "Wanderlust" an emotional song?

Paul It's actually a personal experience. What happened was that we were recording (we went out to the Virgin Islands to record an album called 'London Town') and we were on boats, in a little bay recording for a month. The captain of the boat that we were on was a little, sort of, heavier than the other captains — you know, he sort of took it a little more seriously — and at some stage we had a sort of argument with him, and I sort of said, "You know, we don't need all this aggro stuff", and we wanted to get off onto this other boat that happened to be in the harbour. These people had said we could come on this, and this boat happened to be called "Wanderlust", so it became like a symbol of freedom to me, this catamaran, as it was, called "Wanderlust". We only actually stayed one night on it, but it was like, after this hassling that this other fellow had given us, to get onto this boat was like freedom, you know, so the song for me is actually just carrying on the idea. You know, just head us out to sea and take us away from all these headaches, and just wanderlust kind of free.

Andy Is that what you got out of it?

Paul Yeah, I got a thing of freedom but, I mean (it sounds intense) it was a mood, you know, it was a mood that, as I say, we'd had an argument and it was a feeling the way this particular fellow had been thinking, and the way I was thinking. I really thought he was being very oppressive. I'm sure he had his own side to the stuff, but for me it needed a touch of wanderlust in it.

Andy There must have been times in your life when you felt the need for freedom. I mean, I know when we talked before you were saying that you were never as badly pressured perhaps as people thought you were, by being in the Beatles, and being a famous face, but it must nevertheless have been something that certainly when you were touring things must have got difficult.

Paul It's one of those things, that if you'd probably gone to a psychiatrist and he probed deep he might have found that he was really getting to you. At the time on just a conscious level, I didn't feel like it was much of a pressure at all. There was always a lot to do, and you just kind of went out to look at the sights, and stuff, and what when you look at it baldly seems like huge pressure, wasn't. We were just kept moving from hotel rooms to hotel rooms, from stadium to stadium and so forth. In a way, I suppose you get equated with a doctor always being either in his surgery or in his car or in a patient's house. I always tended to look upon it as that, you know, it's just something we were doing. There was all that sort of craziness accompanying it, and there was never a dull moment really, even though it sounds pretty dull, just being in hotel rooms, but in the little microcosm or whatever it is you just create, little worlds — you know, down the corridor, in someone else's room — would become another little world, and you know, it didn't seem to be that pressurised. But I suppose, if you scraped the surface you might find it's — er - the strangeness of the situation, the strangeness that you were the four most famous people in the world in some ways, at that time.

No, it's funny, you know, the strangeness of that didn't often kinda strike you really. It think it's like, if you talk to Stalin's daughter: Did the hugeness or strangeness of being Stalin's daughter occur to her? She would probably say, "Yes", but mainly her life was involved in just growing up as a person. So for me, we had come from Liverpool and tried to get famous; here we were being famous. This is what fame is! This is the ball game. Obviously, the pressures were there from time to time, and it was always when the frustration was taken off, when it was lifted, those were moments of great relief. I remember some guy on tour called Ira who was with the GAC Agency in New York, and Ira was like our minder, you know, sort of looked after us, something to do with the agency, and a couple of old ladies kind of staring at us, you know, while we were sitting in a room somewhere, and he started, "This ain't no freak show, ladies, you know", and we said, "Yeah, you know". In moments like those we probably over-reacted the other way.

Andy Do you maybe see it more if you see someone else in any comparable situation, do you ever see . . .

Paul Yeah, sometimes I look at other people's things and think, "Well, you know, I've done all of that", and I can see what I think about him going through it, so I can see what people must have seen about me going through it, but what you're asking is me looking at it from my point of view is just like this: I mean, here you and I are sitting in a studio, with somebody through a plate glass window listening to the recording. It's a pretty strange sort of situation, but we both totally accept it, whereas somebody else would feel a great pressure here. I suppose you just sit down, and if you're a bit used to it, it's conditioning.

. . .The other thing about that is, I was gonna say, is with the Beatle thing. You tend to think an overnight success thing because that's what the kinda Vaudeville performers will have been putting around. But it wasn't really. We had minor success at first, then a little bit higher, a little bit higher — it is very stepped, the whole thing. If you think of it as like early days, nothing much at all. A little bit of Hamburg, then building up success step by step in Hamburg, then coming back to England and starting to build that same success over again at the Cavern. Then you'd start to kinda go on a ballroom circuit outside your town, and building that up, then building your reputation within this ballroom circuit. Then you gravitated to theatres, the theatrical circuits, you're building there, too, and these theatres lead to the West End and record success, which was then coming up and all of this was, you know, kinda leading to America. So by the time you got to the ultra craziness of America, in a way we kinda said, "This is nothing, you should have seen it back there at home!"

Andy Back to the album, I noticed that "Here Today", when listening to it, that track could either be about someone in particular or it could be about a situation that could happen to anyone. Is it about anyone in particular?

Paul Yeah, I wrote that particular song about John, but I quite like the way that it sort of translated to anyone, it could be about someone else, but in my case it was about John, yeah.

Andy I like it. It's got one beautiful line in it — "You're in my song", I can't quite remember it, "You're here today in my song". It's interesting. To go back to the top of the album, "Tug of War", not to make too much of a theme, but the sort of freedom and all those things, is that a complaint or a celebration with that song?

Paul A "Tug of War"?

Andy Are you relishing the tug of war?

Andy It's not . . . sort of, the sporting aspect is lost in the struggle?

Paul I think, you know, with my songs, I have my own approach. I'll tell you the way I see it: the thing I like about my stuff, when I like it, is that the listener can take it the wrong way, it may apply to them, you know. Somebody will take the purely sport angle, somebody will take it very much from their angle — it could be about the divorce they've known or that they're in or something. In may case, it's about the fact that it isn't easy, things aren't easy; in an ideal world we could have requested an easier existence, please.

Paul But, you know, in a way it's also kinda saying, but you know that can't be, for some reason.

Andy So that it applies to everyone, it's not . . .

Paul Well, it's not just a personal complaint, no I'm just me, as Everyman.

Andy Just like most artists, really. I mean, there's obviously no reason at all why you should answer any questions about what your songs are about, because the songs should be the statement, and obviously when you start talking about the particular meanings of something, without the music, without the context, it doesn't sound right.

I certainly noticed with Brian Ferry's songs that he expresses, reveals, far more of himself in songs than ever in a conversation, and he does it in a way that it's always surprising — a quite extraordinary amount of revealing things. That's particularly him. I know that that doesn't apply to you.

Paul But, you know, isn't that what a lot of stuff, this "so called art" is about, isn't it? You know that someone in a picture will be able to do something, express something you can't do. Yeah, I think I find it easy, I mean, the same way a lot of people have stutters but don't stutter when they sing a song. That always amazed me that, and I think it is the same way that you can have things said in a song. I mean, I would never have looked at John Lennon and kinda said, "I love you", because it wasn't about that, you know, it was nothing about that. But in a song, in the particular way they're written today, I kinda easily say, "I love you", almost as a throw-away, because it doesn't seem embarrassing in that context. I can always deny that it was ever written about him. Burn the tapes, and delete the . . .

Andy I can't ever write lyrics, I think, because of the same reason; I could only express things through playing, but I have never been able to get that extra thing of putting it into words as well, which I think is probably true of Mozart or someone who does the same thing — like he couldn't possibly express any other way.

Paul Oh yeah, you all have your particular little talents you know; some people would be able to draw it rather than talk it. I always think I am not that good with words.

Andy I wouldn't say that.

Paul Well, I don't know. I mean, I have met somebody, a couple of people, who I have thought are really good with words, are just words men, who have said I am all right with words. Well, I think I am fishing for a compliment here . . .

Andy Going back to what we were talking about earlier, I am trying to find out whether the conscious or the slight pricking of the bubble that you get, whether that's because you sometimes think that maybe there is just a little bit too much emotion being revealed there and you want to get back to normal.

Paul It might be that. I mean, I personally would say it's not that, it's a fear of being pompous. I mean, I don't like pompous stuff, I don't like pompous things. It worries me if I suddenly hear an interview, and I think, "Oh God", you know, "I was in a serious mood", but taken out of context and put now on a sunny day driving along in the car, "Don't I just sound pompous or something." So that's why I always try, I always like a bit of laughter slung in, or something. It's like at the end of 'Sergeant Pepper', "Within You Without You", George's track. There happen to be these peals of like, uncontrollable laughter, and of course, it was like, "Well look, we'd better not have all that laughter 'cos it spoils this very serious, Indian, Eastern mood of George's." But I mean, George wanted it and stuff, you know, it had to be.

Andy You do the opposite on this album, don't you, and after "Get It" which ends with Carl Perkins, it has a great laugh, a very rich kinda sound, and then you have that little "Be What You See", which is beautiful, a sort of ecclesiastical sound, I thought, very pretty, so you're really doing the opposite then, you're kinda actually going from the ridiculous to the sublime...

Just to questions on some other track – I won't actually go through all of them it's not nessarily interesting – "Take It Away" seems a fairly straight forward, a very straight McCartneyish track, very cheerful, but that is one of the songs that sounds very British, funnily enough.

Paul Well, there were a couple of songs that we ended up recording which Ringo asked me to write at a certain period. I was writing some songs for Ringo and "Take It Away" was in amongst those songs. I thought it would suit me better the way it went into the chorus and stuff; I didn't think it was very Ringo.

Andy I like it.

Paul I mean, the chorus I think, was Ringo, the other bits... but that's how that comes to be that kind of track I think, I was right in that sort of direction with Ringo in mind actually.

Andy What tracks did Ringo play on this?

Paul He played on that one, "Take It Away", and he played on another one that we are working on at the moment, which isn't on the first album, so that on that first album I think he is just on "Take It Away".

Andy So Dave Mattacks is doing the rest of the drumming?

Paul No, Steve Gadd.

Andy Yes, on Steve Gadd's tracks I can hear...

Paul I think there is one that might fool you, "Dress Me Up As a Robber". You might think that was Steve Gadd, but it is actually Dave Mattacks anticipating Steve Gadd's arrival in Montserrat. It's my theory, anyway.

Andy "Somebody Who Cares" – that beautiful song, I like that.

Paul I wrote it out one Sunday afternoon. In Montserrat we used to take weekends off just to kinda have some holiday as well as recording, and this Sunday afternoon I was anticipating Steve Gadd's arrival, and Steven and Stanley Clarke were coming in, and I liked the idea of writing something for them coming, you know, so it would be fresh for everyone.

Andy The theme, in as much as I can work out a theme, is the one you have dealt with in quite a lot of songs, isn't it, sort of resignation and optimism, sort of somewhere mixed up.

Paul Somewhere there is someone who is going to take care of things, do you mean? I can't think where I have used it before; I'm sure I have, though.

Andy "Let It Be" is the same, that sort of line of thought.

Andy Yeah, I guess so, though faith always sounds much more, sort of organised.

"What's That You're Doing?" is a great track. Just the riff in the title obviously like that, linked together. I wondered whether the title came from the riff, or did you have the title...

Paul It originally just started off with Stevie Wonder jamming – Stevie is an inveterate jammer, as they say – and he was on the Yamaha CS80 synthesiser and started playing.

Andy It sounds like, you know, the way Jimmy Hendrix used to make his guitar say, "Thank you." If you listen you can actually hear the riff saying, "What's that you're doing?"

Paul He's an incredible controller. He started off on the riff and he built most of the song up actually just from a jam.

Andy That's what it sounds like. I got this thing and it moves from Wonderland to McCartneyland, sort of, as the song progresses. It starts off straight, then it sounds as if they chorus, or the middle eight sounds like you.

Paul It's true, actually, yeah.

Andy And then, as it progresses, they actually mesh into one another very well. That will make a good disco track. I mean, when you were recording it, did you think...

Paul It might do, yeah.

Andy It's good to have a disco track. I mean, at one time it used to be people would think, ah... cashing in.

Paul Oh, disco...?

Andy But what's good is that...

Paul If you use the word dancing instead of disco, it sounds a lot better and it's...

Andy I guess now it means something different, but what you have really got is little temples specially built for playing music loud, for people to dance around in a good environment, and it's a shame not to have some tracks that will work in that atmosphere. One of the worst things is that at one time, no one was making interesting disco records, I mean the discos were playing a lot of terrible stuff. I shall look forward to going into a disco one weary night on the next Roxy tour and hearing that, because it will cheer me up.

Paul Yeah, but it's true, there is a lot of really great disco stuff and you know, it has to be disco if it is to work down those clubs – you can get great records that really don't work down those clubs. I remember being at one of those places and one of my kids wanted some punk stuff on. We asked the DJ and he put some on, and it kinda killed it stone dead. Everyone had been leaping up, they all sort of didn't know what to do, you know, it wasn't dancy as they knew it. Then he put YMCA on, and of course, everyone leapt up out of their seats again.

Andy "Here Today" – we've talked about. On "Somebody Who Cares", was that real flute or is it Farelight?

Paul At the beginning, it's a Roland guitar. Incredible, isn't it? It really doesn't sound like guitar at all. At the very beginning, I know it's very flute-like, set in on a Roland guitar, then through a synth thing. Denny Laine has this set-up which clicked in and just happened on that setting. You know, it's great, it really sounds like a flute, more like a flute than a flute!

Andy It does sound great, so that's all the way through.

Paul Oh, no, no, no. Sorry, wait a minute, I am getting confused here. There's a snatch at the beginning, and that's the guitar, that very sort of flute-like flutter at the beginning, but then it's pan pipes, not at great expense. He was here around the corner, you know, the local pan pipe man.

Andy Side two. It's funny, I actually think I like side two better than side one for some...

Paul It's funny, yeah. When we were going home one evening in the car, we had a little cassette of side two (side one wasn't ready for some reason) and we played it. It flows quite nicely.

Andy It has an interesting mixture of things.

Paul It's nice to know once you have heard side one that side two doesn't go down hill. I always feel that side two often goes down hill.

I felt kinda chuffed. I remember coming back in to George and saying, "Look, side two really works, you know, it's good."

Andy "Wanderlust" is in the sort of hiding spot.

Paul It is, isn't it, yeah.

Andy Is that the track you don't want people to listen to, middle of side two?

Paul Yeah, traditional burial place.

Andy "Ballroom Dancing", that's the strongest kinda rocker, isn't it, it has a strong rock 'n' roll feel, it's nice starting the side. It's interesting, 'cos your main roots are rock 'n' roll; I remember your Desert Island Discs selection was 90% rock 'n' roll. I guess it's sort of sublimated in nearly every track you do. But this one is the most out and out rock 'n' roll; it reminds me of a Lieber and Stoller song, the Coasters feel. I don't mean a particular song, it's just got that sort of Coasters thing about it which I quite like. It's got humour in it.

Paul A bit of tongue-in-cheek stuff. I was surprised actually, I thought we were doing more rock 'n' roll.

Andy I think it's there all the time, because...

Andy Rock 'n' roll meaning a kind of, I suppose, a 50s feeling. It's all there in lots of other songs, but it's good, it works really well. I like...

Paul Ballroom dancing for me is a sort of childhood dream thing. You know, images, snatches from childhood and then you just tie them all up at the ballroom all the time, you know, as if it was...

Andy You used to go ballroom dancing?...

Paul Almost, it was one of the places to go. Dances were where you went to look for girls.

No, I never actually got really into it and got my own costume and learned any steps, but I remember as a little kid, your Mum would kind of teach you to waltz and stuff, and you would have to...

Andy I never learnt it. I actually came from that generation that didn't ever have to learn even a waltz, it was just that by that time I could go to...

Andy By the time I could go to school dances, they would have a combo but they were kinda playing rock 'n' roll.

Paul I used to go with my mate. I remember going with George Harrison quite a bit 'cos we lived locally and we used to take a bus up to a school where they had a dance, and you know, they just dim the lights a bit – a couple of coloured lights – and then it was all a pretty embarrassing evening, really, 'cos we couldn't do any of the dances, the Paul Jones, all the traditional stuff that they did, we didn't know how to do (and you always had to pay to get in!) So the only one we knew how to do, both our mothers had taught us how to do in the traditional manner. But you are trying to fool everyone that you are too young to learn, but we know better!

Andy I was such a bad dancer. I came from a whole line of bad dancers; none of my family can dance.

Paul I wasn't exactly Fred Astaire, but it was the idea that you had to do the last waltz, or you would have gone to a dance and not danced, which would be silly, you know, you might as well stay away from the dance. Also the object was to go and try and pick up a girl so you had to get some body contact by the end of the evening or you would just feel cheated.

Andy I think I missed out. I think those dances were great. It's nice now, when you go to something with your parents and it's all older people and yet they can actually get up and glide around the floor and enjoy themselves.

Paul I always look at the way the first couple get up – what do you call them – like the MCs. I remember George's Mum and Dad were that. George's Dad was a bus driver who used to work at Finch Lane Bus Depot, and they were the lead couple. You know, everyone would sit around, have a couple of drinks, the music would come on, and they would get up and walk slap into the middle of the floor and start dancing. And that was the signal that everyone could dance, and I would think, "God, that takes some courage!"

Andy "The Pound is Sinking", that's an interesting song, I am curious about this. Obviously there is sort of pleasure in the words and the rhythms and the idea of it all, the sort of irony...

Paul For me, it's just the funny thing about the pundits day to day giving us an update so that all the people who've got money can gauge it all, like the weather. There is something which sort of amuses me about this constant update of something that is always going to be different, you are never going to be able to put your finger on it, but it just might help, knowing if there is snow on the M6, but generally they make more mistakes than they make correct predictions, it seems to me. You know, the pound is sinking – panic – and then the pound's all right now, and everyone gets back into it. It's a funny idea; I like the idea of all the ants doing what the lead ant tells them, you know, the oracle.

Andy There is someone whose father is a remarkable man. Anyone in particular?

Paul It's not about anyone, no. Sometimes I just get little jumbles of words that sound nice and I haven't even really got a meaning to them, but I know that they're words, and that they have a meaning so I don't really attempt to resolve that...

In this, it's mainly just the ridiculousness, apparent ridiculousness, of the money market – the ups and downs and the indexes and stuff – and then that little bit there that comes in the middle, it's the funny little conversation: I always imagine it like a sort of film where there is one character doing this pound is sinking bit, and explaining all the rest, and there is this little inter-cut scene with this other little bit about "your father is an extraordinary man, but you haven't inherited any of his mannerisms." It's just a bunch of words, it just kinda says something that people say all the time...

Andy There is one little intense bit that I couldn't hear just before it goes back into the end of that section, a screaming bit.

Paul Oh yeah, that's again sort of unrelated, but I mean, there are certain things that I can put my finger on and say, "Well that's how I think of them", certain things even I can't put my finger on 'cos I don't write them like that. It's like looking at an abstract picture, you know. The fellow painting it kinda says, "What do you think it looks like? Looks like a couch, doesn't it?" But that's only what he sees and he's not saying it is a couch, so for me, those are the little random bursts or words that you kinda make up your own meaning on all that stuff if you can hear it.

Andy On "Wanderlust" again, can you remember what you did with the vocal sound in the beginning? It's very interesting, a very strange sort of sound.

Paul I can't really remember what we did to it actually, and I am looking at Geoff our engineer here who is as puzzled as I am. I don't know... I spent a bit of time – I wasn't too happy with how it sounded – so I went back in and sung it a bit differently, and maybe that something, maybe something I was doing... myself, I don't think we really put much of an effect on it.

Andy It sounds... it's a very good sound. I mean, the whole album though, does have a great sound. I imagine that the digital mixing must have helped.

Paul We were pleased with that, yeah. I mean, it was the first time I have mixed digitally, and George Martin and Geoff Emerick wanted to get into it and we experimented, we did it on tape, or, and digital at the same time, and kinda just compared the two, and yeah, we were getting the much cleaner response, you know. So when you figure it's gonna go out down to some worn out old record in a few years' time, we thought we would try and get as clean a kinda signal onto the record as possible.

Andy "Dress Me Up as a Robber" – is that the one you were talking about that sounds Steve Gaddish?

Paul Yes, I think that does sound Steve Gaddish in its rhythm, but it's a kinda Latin thing that Steve would do anyway. We did it in Montserrat where we had different people at different times, you know. Dave Mattacks was there drumming on certain tracks and then we was returned to England and nearly overlapping him was Steve Gadd, to kinda take over. And I think for me, I always say today, I can hear him sort of anticipating Steve's arrival and sort of thinking about this. He plays a bit Steve Gadd-y style, which is nice actually, it makes a nice change for us. It sort of keeps a bit of a continuity rather than it just being everyone's very different, they kind of assimilated a bit to each other, sort of thing.

Andy Are the words anything of great significance?

Paul Dressed up as a robber – the words are just kinda words, they just came about. You can do whatever you like to me, you can call me what you like, but I'll still be what I am; you can dress me up as a sailor, a robber, a soldier, but it really won't matter, I will still be me. If you dress me up as a soldier I will be the little fellow who goes to Northern Ireland and writes a book about the horrors of it – I won't be a soldier really, or you know what I mean, that kind of thought.

Andy And "Ebony & Ivory" is sort of really, quite a simple song, isn't it? Straight forward it says it all, quite straight forward.

Paul I was thinking it would be a good idea to write a second verse and continue the thought. I tried a couple of things, but I just couldn't say anything beyond the bald statement of just the piano analogy and... that was it, you know, black and white notes, you need them to have harmony.

Andy You know – I suppose it's suggested anyway – anything that's about black and white races involves some concept of oppression, or something, 'cos that's our background on it.

Paul Yeah, I think so. You know, I talked to someone originally about doing it and he said, "Well, maybe it wouldn't be a good idea just to sing the song straight, because it would seem just a bit too syrupy, like you know, there is an easy answer to the black and white thing. I mean, also, the trouble with writing a song called "Ebony & Ivory" with such a bit theme is you tend to not also talk about red and yellow, you know, talking about black and white. I mean it's basically a symbol for any racial disharmony.

Andy Is it something you have thought about for a long time?

Paul I don't know. I think being a musician, you don't really seem to have a sort of number with black people, 'cos a lot of them are musicians and there is this understanding...

Andy Also, there is a thing a lot of English kids had in the 50s when they suddenly discovered that rock 'n' roll people were black, 'cos you heard the records and you hadn't really thought about them being black, particularly, though you were always aware that Chuck Berry and Little Richard were black.

Paul Yeah, well I had seen photos of the men when that stuff came out and films like "A Girl Can't Help It" – you saw a lot of them, but it didn't mean black in the kind of civil rights kinda way, it didn't occur. None of that appeared to come into it, mind you, as far as I am concerned. I would never really have been around any great intolerance, as some people have, you know. I have seen it on the housing estate where I used to live. I mean you do all the sort of jokes, I suppose, along with everyone – the prejudice type of jokes – as you would do the Irish or whatever you do.

...Well this is one of the things about it. When I wrote it I thought yeah, nice song, says ebony and ivory. I like the melody and stuff, I thought that would be good that, because it will maybe say something to someone who is going to go on...

Andy It's not always something that has worried you, you have not had a strong feeling that you have got to do something for race...

Paul No, no, not really. So much so that when I wrote it I thought well, I mean, the problem with this is maybe it isn't really necessary, maybe I have missed the boat, it would have been necessary, but then, when we came to record it and stuff, I don't know, you still see a lot of it about and...

Andy Maybe it's good to write a song which isn't like a big complex statement, but a theme for a song and it's not now necessarily something that is going to destroy society or otherwise, but it is still there.

Paul Yeah, I mean, I just think if, in the same way as "All You Need is Love" kinda said, "maybe love is the better policy than hate", it just sort of suggested that, didn't really go an awful lot further. Maybe you can free yourself with this thing called love, maybe it is a good thing, a good force, the same as I think you just kinda suggested that harmony between peoples is a good idea rather than a bad idea, and I strongly believe that anyway; I think it's inevitable anyway. I would just like to hurry it up really.

Andy Had you planned to work with Stevie before you started this album? Was that a long standing sort of thing, you know – "we must do some recording together"?

Paul It had been mentioned. We had been talking about it when we met each other. We said we must do something sometime. I had been sniffing around a bit so when...

Andy ...So then you started thinking about 'Tug of War' and...

Paul Well, "Ebony & Ivory" more than anything. I was bringing songs to George – any ideas that I had – I would give him and see what he thought of them, and that was one of the ideas. I thought, well it would be really good to do it with a black guy and a white guy and really literally sort of just show the feeling that you are trying to get over anyway.

Paul Stevie? Yeah, very much so...

Andy So once you get an idea, does he then work on it a lot to kinda re-do parts?

Paul He's very helpful, he gets into it, he's very enthusiastic, you know; he's not the kinda fellow who just sits by and lets you do it.

Andy There is a great precision about...

Paul He's competitive, too.

Andy About the tracks he played, you can hear the very precise keyboard.

Paul I love it, you know. I admire that, so it's great for me to be involved in that, that was one of the things, you know. Hewas my first choice for a black vocalist to sing "Ebony & Ivory" with, and he agreed to do it, that was one thing. And then the other thing of him just as a musician, where I think we noticed that the certain ways which we worked were pretty similar: he does albums using just himself or he has done in the past, playing all the instruments, which I have done – one of my little things, too – and certain methods in the studio are pretty similar. We fell in with each other.

Andy Who plays bass on "What's that You're Doing"?

Paul I played bass on it, but there are kinda two basses. There is a CS80 noise, which is like a bass, then I double it up with a real bass.

Andy What tracks did Stanley Clarke play on that?

...I think we can cut now. and "thank you very much".

Andy That's very good, actually, today. I think we have a lot of very interesting things. I think that a lot of the talking about the past seems to come better starting from this album...

PAUL McCARTNEY CASTAWAY

Helping to celebrate 40 years of Britain's favourite radio programme.

BBC Radio's Desert Island Discs, the longest running musical request programme, is something of a British institution. Opening with the sounds of sea gulls in its familiar signature tune, the programme, devised and presented by Roy Plomley, asks famous people to choose the eight records they would like to have with them if they became marooned on a desert island, interspersing the record selections with auto-biographical chat. The person is also asked to select one luxury item and one book — other than the Bible and Shakespeare — to take along.

Last January, Paul McCartney became the 1,630th "cast-away" on Roy Plomley's 40th anniversary programme, which gave an insight into his own musical tastes. The eight records selected by Paul were:

1. "Heartbreak Hotel" – Elvis Presley
2. "Sweet Little Sixteen" – Chuck Berry
3. "Be Bop a Lula" – Gene Vincent
4. Benjamin Britten's "Country Dances from Gloriana" played by the guitarist Julian Bream
5. "Beautiful Boy" – John Lennon
6. "Searchin'" – The Coasters
7. "Tutti Frutti" – Little Richard
8. "Walking in the Park with Eloise" – James McCartney. This song, written by Paul's father, was recorded by the Country Hams who were:
   Paul McCartney
   Chet Atkins
   Floyd Krammer
   Geoff Britten

Paul's appearance on the programme was included in BBC-TV's arts programme, ARENA, in a feature on the 40 years of Desert Island Discs, which was screened in England in February.

Listen to what the fans said

● Dear Paul,
Hooray, on your new album!!! I applaud you a thousand times over. I haven't heard it yet but I know it will be a sure winner. (By the time this letter reaches you the record should be released here! I can't wait!) I just know it will zoom straight up the charts to number one.

It must have been such fun being on a working holiday in Montserrat, and working with the great producer: George Martin. What a great experience (and fun time) you must have had recording with all those wonderful artists like Stevie Wonder, Carl "Blue Suede Shoes" Perkins, Denny Laine, and who could forget RINGO!!! I know this album will contain some of the most beautiful and best music to this date! The only thing that could top it off is if you would (PLEASE) tour the U.S.! Keep on singing and thanks for the fantastic tunes.

Your No. 1 Funster,
DERRY SILVERMAN

● Dear Paul,
Congratulations are in order — you've done it again!!! Let me explain, because you're probably not aware of it.

There is a TV show here, called "American Top Ten", where they review the weekly top 10 songs in the nation, according to Billboard magazine. You might know of the show seeing as "Coming Up" was also shown on this.

Occasionally they do what they call "special editions". For example, they've done "The Top 10 Acts of the 60s" in which a group who can never be nameless, was No. 1 (did someone say the Beatles?), "The Top 10 Female Performers of the Rock Era" etc. Last Saturday, they reviewed "The Top 10 Male Performers of the Rock Era". We assumed this would mean just solo performers. Not so, the host explained that the man could be solo or in a group; if he was in a group, he had to be the lead singer of the song that was counted as a hit by Billboard. Billboard counted how many times the performers hit the Top 40, the Top 10 and reached No. 1, arriving at their Top 10 in that manner.

One of your idols, Elvis, came in as the No. 1 male performer of the rock era. But our "idol" came in 2nd — only to his idol.

You'll never know how pleased this whole family was — that you and John placed so high. In case you're interested, here's the entire top 10 list:

1. Elvis Presley
2. Paul McCartney
3. John Lennon
4. Stevie Wonder
5. Mick Jagger
6. Michael Jackson
7. Pat Boone
8. Frankie Valli
9. Elton John
10. Ricky Nelson.

UNCLE ALBERT rode his HELEN WHEELS to LONDON TOWN. He took the RED ROSE SPEEDWAY to JUNIOR'S FARM and bought a RAM.

In the evening, he went to a ROCK SHOW, and after the RECEPTION he met THE LOVELY LINDA, who sang SILLY LOVE SONGS AGAIN AND AGAIN AND AGAIN. That's why her BAND was always on the RUN.

WITH A LITTLE LUCK, they got married despite the protest of SALLY G. He gave his bride a WINTER ROSE as a wedding gift and called her MY LOVE.

The couple took off in a JET to spend their honeymoon in MULL OF KINTYRE and slept on a BIG BARN BED. They built a house near the WATERFALLS and lived happily ever after.

The end.

● Dear Paul and Linda,
This is the first time I write to "Listen to What the Fans Said". You know, I joined the Wings Fun Club early this year, and I'm too excited being a member of this club, it's fantastic. I'm a very great Wings fans.

I want to congratulate you on an excellent issue (No. 25) which is great. I often look in this issue. Linda is really a great photographer, the best I know. I always admire her photos especially "Paul at work and play" and instant photos. I want to congratulate Heather for winning the Photoprint Award. I wish her all the best. Last year I bought the record "McCartney Interview". It's very great. Many compliments to Paul who provided me with 45 minutes of absolute pleasure.

SABINE STILLGER

● Dear Sue,
Thank you for the latest issue of Club Sandwich, which includes a great picture of John and Yoko. Also, I think the back cover of Club Sandwich with Paul looking towards 1982, is adorable.

I'm really looking forward to receiving Paul's new book "Composer/Artist". I'm sure it will be a big success, such as his new album, which I can't wait to receive when it hits the states. I'd like to conclude my letter with a simple wish that Linda succeeds with her new book.

JANINE LETINSKI
Wilkes-Barre, Pa., U.S.A.

● Dear Sirs,
I have the pleasure to inform you that on Sunday, 21st March, 1982 Italy all saw the beautiful promo: EBONY & IVORY.

Please tell Paul I think he is the best in everything and I'm looking forward to see his album in the shop-window of my record shop.

GULIANA MASSIMINO

● Dear Paul,
I would very much like you to note that I think your new book "Paul McCartney Composer/Artist" is absolutely fabulous! I have never owned a book of all of your greatest songs and music!

The drawings are great and very funny and I just cannot stop laughing at "Edna" the cartoon drawing to go along with "Mull of Kintyre" — not really going along with the tune, is it? I insist that "Rockshow" comes here soon. I mean, its costing a fortune in Evening Posts to see if it has YET come to one of our cinemas!

Love from
MICHAELA BLADES
Stapleford, Nottingham

● Dear Sue,
You cannot imagine how I'm happy now, 'cause I received the last issue, a very beautiful issue, in my opinion. Today when I came back from the "hated" school I found the issue in my room, lying on my bed. What a beautiful surprise!!! However, my English is still scholastic and simple, so I had to read very slowly. As you can see from my address, I'm Italian and I hope to see Paul, Linda and Wings soon, in my country . . . But speaking about the issue, I liked very much Paul's first photos and then the photos of "Buddy Holly Rock 'n' Roll Movie Week". They are splendid. Then I'd like to thank Paul, Linda, you and other reporters of Club Sandwich, 'cause you give us a very very big happiness, with the pictures and articles of the issues.

FRANCESCA GAZZANO

● To CLUB SANDWICH
Congratulations Paul, on "Ebony & Ivory" — a really well presented single with a sensible and very striking design. Everything about it matches — ebony & ivory; black and white contrast; the lyrics and McCartney/Wonder. It looks great and sounds even better. Well done — it deserves everyone's attention.

Best of luck.

DANIEL COULSTON

● Dear Fun Club,
Enclosed please find my membership renewal.

I would just like to say that I have enjoyed the "magazine" very much over the years. I first joined when I was 13 years old and I am now 22 so I can only conclude that you must be doing it right! Really though — I find the newsletter interesting, informative and thankfully not aimed entirely at young teenagers who are into Paul or Wings. There's a lot of us "older kids" around, too who enjoy the group and paper as well.

Keep up the good work.

ELISSA RICH
Flourtown, PA., U.S.A.

● Dear Sue,
I must write, I'm not often moved, but I have just heard the most touchingly beautiful sound ever, from the two most gifted music makers of the day.

"Ebony & Ivory" is without doubt wonderful. Or McCartney and Wonderful! Please, please, pass the message to Paul.

With thanks and love.

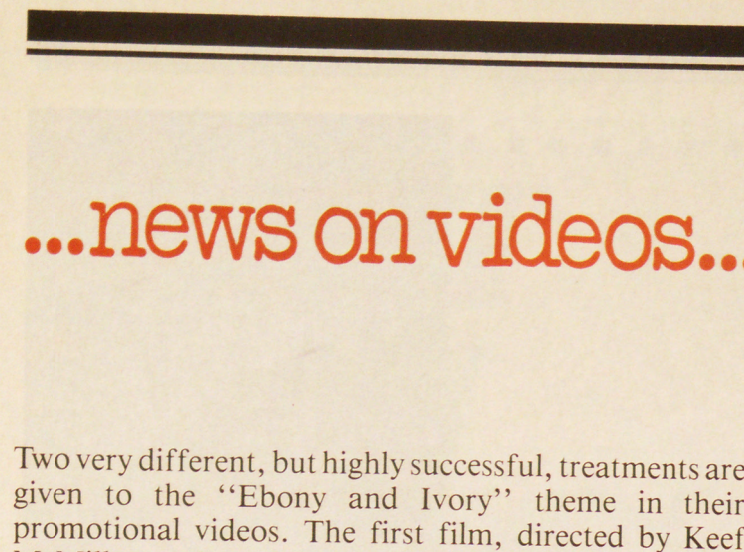
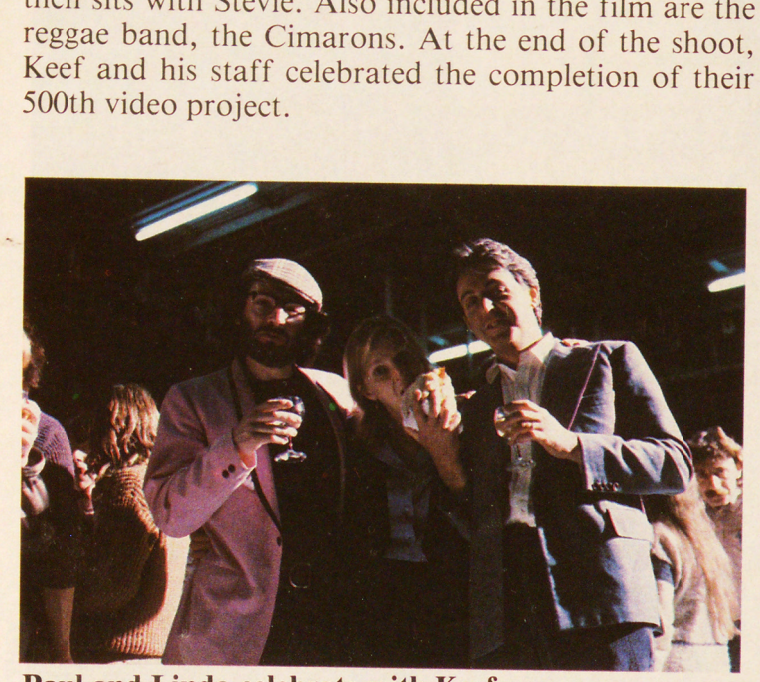
EBONY and IVORY

Two very different, but highly successful, treatments are given to the "Ebony and Ivory" theme in their promotional videos. The first film, directed by Keef McMillan and recently screened on BBC-TV's Top of the Pops programme, relates the black/white, ebony/ivory theme to the lyrics and the piano keyboard. Featuring Paul McCartney and Stevie Wonder singing the song, one of the scenes depicts a specially constructed 40ft keyboard upon which Paul walks and then sits with Stevie. Also included in the film are the reggae band, the Cimarons. At the end of the shoot, Keef and his staff celebrated the completion of their 500th video project.



Paul and Linda celebrate with Keef



The other "Ebony & Ivory" video, directed by Barry Myers, sets its theme in a prison atmosphere. Cutting back and forth between the image of Paul singing the song and the prison scenes, it shows how the tension between a gaoler and one of the prisoners is resolved by the prisoner's gaining his "freedom" through the medium of the song. Beautifully photographed, it includes a prison yard scene which was shot at the old Royal Mint in London.

MEET JON JACOBS

Many of us find ourselves scrutinizing the small print on the sleeve of a new album, like the ingredients on a cereal packet, which credits the many behind-the-scenes people who unite to produce the finished project. Among those to be found on Paul McCartney's new album, "Tug of War" is the name of Jon Jacobs, a rising young recording engineer, who worked as assistant to Geoff Emerick. Having working on this album was something of a milestone in his career, something he already reflects upon with considerable satisfaction and pride.

Twenty-one year old Jon spent the first eleven years of his life in Northwood, Middlesex before being sent to Stowe School where he first became interested in music. Having been good at doing things with his hands, Jon made himself a bass guitar one summer which he taught himself to play, and formed a little rock group when he returned to school. As Jon became involved in his group, he began to focus his attention more and more on the actual sound of the music, the balance and tonal quality. Gradually he immersed himself totally in music, somewhat to the detriment of his school work.

By the time Jon was sixteen he knew that he was interested in two things: working with bits of metal, and music, so against all advice he decided to leave school. As his parents had moved to the New Forest area, Jon decided to attend a college in Southampton where he did a crash course in engineering and completed the exams he had failed at Stowe. Stimulated by the different environment of his college but still undecided about his future, Jon decided to take a summer job in industry, where he operated a lathe and had time to think over the direction of his life.

Having decided that he really wanted to be involved in music, Jon was determined somehow to break into the technical side of recording, and through a series of lucky breaks, spunk and determination, Jon found himself taken on at the bottom of the ladder at Air Studios in London. After a year spent doing all the duff jobs — from buying nails to running messages — Jon was more than impatient to get his foot into the door of the studio, although he now admits that he received a valuable background into the business side of studio work.

At that time Geoff Emerick was working on some sessions with Robin Tower and he noticed Jon's keenness to get involved in studio work, so Geoff's assistant, John Walls, began to show the fundamentals to Jon who stayed and watched the sessions. Shortly afterwards Robin had some more work to do and as John Walls was away, Geoff turned to Jon to take the assistant's place. His ambitions realised, he has gone on to work with various artists among whom were Kate Bush and Elvis Costello, before becoming involved with Paul and George Martin on the "Tug of War" album.

Jon's first participation on the album was on the song, "Tug of War" whose sessions were split between a studio in Hastings and Air Studios in London. He recalls the slightly unreal feeling of standing on a South London street at 4 a.m. waiting for his lift to Hastings, with the tapes for Paul McCartney's new album under his arms — exhilerating, certainly, but also a bit daunting! However, all signs of his early nervousness soon vanished as the sessions got under way with Paul's doing vocals, accompanying himself on acoustic guitar.

From Jon's point of view the "Tug of War" album was particularly interesting, as it incorporated such varied and unusual features from string quartets and brass ensembles to orchestras, sometimes laid down on as many as 92 tracks! The mixing of such a complex album is such a fine and precise art that it gets the adrenalin flowing as much as during a live performance. An additional factor was that it was a digital master, which required a quite unique editing technique, a very slow and painstaking art which yields the purest sound results. Jon emphasises, however, that the greatest equipment won't give any "colouration" of sound; it receives only what one puts into it.

Away from the studio, music continues to absorb Jon's life, but with an entirely different slant. He listens, rather surprisingly, on very average stereo equipment, and while his sensitivity to sound quality is still there, when he listens for pleasure it is more the feel of the music and the content, than the pure sound. His current interests span from the classical, Thomas Tallis in particular, to a somewhat obscure contemporary sound which he describes as "alternative music", with a heavy political commitment and an almost a-tonal sound.

Jon credits the job with having given him a much broader outlook in music, an ability to look beyond first impressions for the essence of the musical experience. To the uninitiated, the complexities of modern recording techniques almost defy the imagination. For an engineer, hearing the results is like slotting together a jigsaw; he can isolate the components which are lost in the "whole" to the average listener.

This was highlighted for Jon as he walked down Oxford Street in London recently and heard the hit single, "Ebony & Ivory" wafting out from the racks of jeans and shirts in the open shops on the street. It gave him a distinct thrill to hear it out in the real world, to be so intimately attuned to its every note, and to know that he had been a small part of producing that wonderful sound. That privilege was the ultimate meaning of the job.

SUE'S LETTER

- Hi there!
- I know it's been a while since you last heard from us, but we've hardly been slacking, as it's been a time buzzing with excitement, as this ish reveals. Of course the main news is the release on 26 April of Paul's terrific album 'Tug of War' (EMI Parlophone PC TC 259) which has zoomed into the charts worldwide following on the smash hit single, "Ebony & Ivory". It's bound to be a monster success, as I'm sure all of you will agree! Its cover features a striking red and blue abstract painting by Brian Clarke, with a Linda snap of Paul superimposed upon it. This lovely image is used on a complete range of exciting new merchandise which has been specially created to accompany the album's launch. You Funsters will be able to purchase this range at special reduced prices (see your Club Offer sheet for full details.
- Although Paul's been really busy, he's found time to slot in some interviews about the album, which I hope some of you've heard. BBC's Radio One aired Andy Peebles' interview on April 18, while the Stuart Grundy/Alexis Korner interview has been given worldwide distribution to radio stations. This issue contains the exclusive publication of Paul's recent chat with Andy MacKay in which Paul gives some fascinating clues to his feelings about the album.
- But it's been right back to work for Paul, who's progressing nicely on his NEXT album, set for an autumn release. And I hear that is truly superb — could it be anything less? Paul and Linda did a bit of work on it in April out at Cherokee Studios in L.A. Accompanied by George Martin and Geoff Emerick, they spent a day putting the horns down on a couple of tracks by Michael Jackson, "This is the Man" and "Say, Say, Say". Soon Paul's going to do a reciprocal thing for Michael's next album, along with Quincey Jones.
- Linda's been busy on her projects, also. Our next SANDWICH will give you an exclusive peek at her new book, which is due to be published in the autumn. And more of her pix will be on view at exhibitions being held in London, Paris, and New York next Autumn, but more about that closer to the time . . . I know you British Funsters will welcome the publication of a paperback edition of Linda's Pictures (Pavilion Books, £5.95) . . . No news yet on the completion of the Rupert Bear animation, which is progressing well . . . Early May saw the publication of the sheet music for the "Tug of War" album which is available from Music Sales Ltd., 78 Newman Street, London W1.
- Many of you will have already heard about the reggae group, the Cimarons, who have been a well established band for twelve years. Recently Paul thought it would be nice to have some reggae treatments of some of his songs plus some from the MPL publishing catalogue, so the Cimarons went into Chalk Farm and Hillside Studios and laid down the tracks for their rootsy album, "Reggaebility". Following the first single, "With a Little Luck", is another one, "Big Girls Don't Cry" B/W "Poor People of Paris" plus a 12" disco version. A video is now being completed of a concert the Cimarons gave recently at the 5,000 seater Fair Deal Theatre in Brixton, the second largest concert venue in London.
- A lot of you Funsters have been asking me about the future of Wings, so I thought I'd ask Paul about this. He said that although he has been working alone on these next two albums, and the other members of the band are working alone, too, there's every chance that they may come together again in the future. Who knows? "These days", says Paul, "freedom is all." So you see, it's an open situation!
- Lastly, I'd like to remind members to use P.O. Box 4UP, London W1A 4UP, the official address of the Fun Club for everything except orders, which should be sent to Mailroom. And if you still have any credit notes issued by Concessions Ltd., please return them to me for new notes or refunds.
- Well that's about all for now. Don't forget to send in your letters and artwork for our next ish.
- 'til next time,

Sue

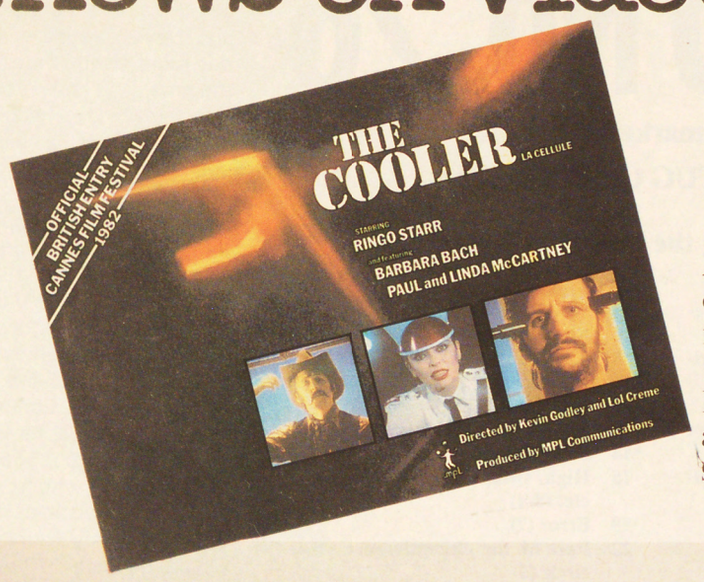
...news on videos... THE COOLER



A new mini-film produced by MPL Communications called "The Cooler" was recently entered in the short film category at the Cannes Film Festival, held from 14-26 May. It is a short musical psycho-drama starring Ringo Starr, Barbara Bach, Paul and Linda McCartney, and set in a prison camp, policed entirely by women, somewhere, sometime in the future.

Ringo plays an habitual escapee who, at the beginning of the film, is caught and thrown into "The Cooler", a form of solitary confinement he knows only too well. As his mental state deteriorates, he fantasises about his position and his ambiguous relationship with the camp commandant, played by his wife, Barbara Bach. Paul McCartney appears three times in the film — as a prisoner, Ringo's cowboy father, and as the bass player in a Country and Western band. Linda McCartney appears as one of the guards — watch out for them!

The music featured in the film is taken from the album, "Stop & Smell the Roses", and the three tracks are "Private Property" by Paul McCartney, "Sure to Fall", by Carl Perkins, Quinton Claunch and William Cantrell, and "Attention" by Paul McCartney. Plans for a commercial distribution are being finalised.
